Ephemera and Ambiguity

Archaeologists struggle to find evidence of Enslaved people escaping to freedom. Excavations at River Lea, Grand Island, New York, uncovered a midden and post molds of a structure, possibly Native American. Analysis of faunal remains revealed a diverse and complex assemblage which included many worked bone objects, some made from domesticated species. The midden consisted of an upper level containing early nineteenth century artifacts, and a lower level, dating to the late Woodland period. It seems unlikely that the worked bone assemblage is Native American, as by this time they no longer resided on the island and would not have used bone for tools. It is more likely that the site was occupied by Enslaved people seeking freedom in Canada. The ruins of the Native American house and the richness of available resources may have attracted them while awaiting safe passage. Subsequent analysis of bone assemblages from slave quarter sites in Maryland have yielded similar bone tools. A new hypothesis is proposed that bone tools from historic period sites may have been made by African Americans in the past from which aspects of their lives may be investigated.
